

By the seemingly unfair redefining of speeds and parity, and what it means for rural Americans to have access to the same speeds as other Americans (just based on odd geographical issues), the FCC would allow companies to cynically “rig” efforts to connect Americans. This is in spite of the legal requirement to provide equal access. From what I understand, mobile broadband service isn’t currently, nor could it in the near-term support the same speeds and feeds as other Americans get because of their geographic position, only. This isn’t fair, and not what I expect from our government, which is set to watch out for all of us, especially the most vulnerable, who have the least ability to make themselves and their issues heard.
